Not illustrated. 1889 Excerpt: . . . of human history just as it is, lifted before the public gaze and shone upon by the circumambient light of genius, so that every act and thought and circumstance stands revealed, and every beholder can draw his own moral and value it the more because it is his own. The ability to do this miracle is the rarest gift vouchsafed to men; and if in its largest measure it has been worked through the instrumentality of our English tongue, let us not prove ourselves unworthy of the distinction by classing our great poet, who teaches virtue by the display of universal nature, with inferior artists, who display only so much of nature as their limited conception of virtue will illustrate. The medical critics are unanimous in pronouncing Hamlet really mad. This is merely a professional illusion. The mind dwelling on certain symptoms, projects them wherever it turns, just as the eye that has been fixed on a coloured outline will see it in the lucid blue of heaven. A legal friend said to me a few days since with energetic seriousness that if the affair of the rat behind the arras had been brought before a judge and jury the tragedy would probably be brought to a sudden and ignominious close. Dr. Conolly is enamoured of a French version in which, in the scene between Hamlet and his mother, the words of the ghost are omitted, and thus poor Hamlet seems raving mad, not only to...
